One Day...

The sun creeps up the bedroom wall,
A golden finger, thin and tall,
To wake the world from quiet rest
And put the morning to the test.

The kettle hums a silver tune,
Predicting heat by afternoon,
While shadows shrink beneath the trees
To hide away from every breeze.

A thousand plans begin to spin,
Of where to go and who we've been,
But hours are water in the hand,
Escaping like the grains of sand.

The midday glare is bright and bold,
Turning the dusty streets to gold,
Until the sky begins to blush
And settles in a purple hush.

One day is but a tiny spark,
A brief defiance of the dark,
A single breath, a closing door,
Then gone to join the days before.
